

A local harvest for the soul

Welcome to Starfish Bloo, a vibrant oceanfront restaurant with a focus on seafood, locally sourced products and ingredients grown in our own garden.

We strive to present the best quality of delicious food and drinks, while taking a sustainable and protective approach for our planet.

Our seafood is fresh from the Indian Ocean, freshly picked vegetables are grown in our “backyard” and rice varieties are harvested from nearby rice paddies. Also, Starfish Bloo aims to develop a plant-based menu with zero-waste dishes.

We hope you enjoy our culinary offerings in the traditional local way - sharing with your family and friends.

Agriculture has been and continues to be one of the economic foundations of Bali and is a major livelihood for Balinese people. The wide agricultural area or rice field is a symbol of community prosperity. It is accepted that the region which consists of a wide of rice fields is considered as a rich region and their inhabitants consequently have a better standard of living, due to having enough food. Because the agricultural sector was capable to enhance the community's prosperity the people should give an effort to own more rice fields (built or bought).

Rice is a staple food in Bali and it has strong ties to the Balinese culture. The cycle of rice growth pretty much sets the tone for much of the traditional Balinese life. The Balinese community views rice as a gift from God and a symbol of life.

For thousands of years, the Balinese people have been growing rice and cultivating the beautiful rice terraces of Bali where three kinds of rice are grown: white rice, black rice, and red rice. White rice is the most common one while red rice is much rarer and more expensive.

Lemon basil (called kemangi in Indonesia) is a hybrid between basil and American basil. The herb is grown primarily in northeastern Africa and southern Asia for its fragrant lemon scent, and is used in cooking.

Kemangi is the only basil used much in Indonesian cuisine. It is often eaten raw with salad or lalap (raw vegetables) and accompanied by sambal. Lemon basil is often used to season certain Indonesian dishes, such as curries, soup, stew and steamed or grilled dishes.
